She moved to twitch the curtain back into place, but something stopped her. A light flickering—the tiniest light. A candle. The ghost was there. Miranda froze, still clutching one of the curtains. He was even more breathtaking this second time, his face like chiseled marble. Tonight he wasn’t smiling at all, but his eyes were warm, velvety dark. Miranda wished there weren’t two closed windows—and a stretch of very cold open air—separating them. She wanted to talk to him. The ghost opened his mouth: was he trying to say something?

From Cleopatra’s Moon

As the priests and priestesses chanted the final prayers, I wanted to jump and cheer and laugh. It was my family’s proudest moment! I drank it all in—the masses cheering; the white-robed Priests of Serapis chanting over bowls of smoky incense; the long-haired Priestesses of Isis extending their thin arms to the sky; the sweet fragrance of flowers as countless petals swirled around us, floating through the air like tiny perfumed birds. It was so beautiful, almost magical. The Triumph of the Ptolemies! The greatest moment of our lives. But the gods would not stand for us to have such happiness for long. And so began the slow, excruciating process of our undoing.
